Brave Men in Battle. Lord Wolseley, writing in the Fortnightly would be impossible for me to point to any one man and say he was the bravest man i ever knew. But I think that Captain Sir William Peel, of the Royal Navy, possessed courage of an order that I have never seen so strongly marked in any other man. Dur He offers special inducements at wholesale to ing all our nombardments at Sebastopol it was his invariable practice to walk about behind his battery on the natural plateau of the ground where he had little or no pro-tection from the enemy's fire. This he did from no swagger, but to set an example to his men of cool contempt for danger. I can see him now with his talescope under his arm, in quarter deck fashion, halting from time to time to watch the effect of his battery upon the enemy's works, or to direct the attention of his men in charge of guns to some particular spot or object in the Redan or Malakoff. He was thus always in view; his men could always see him, as they were down in the trench before him, and so, in comparative safety, all felt that his eye was upon them, and if he in that exposed position made so light of his great danger they could not presume to wince under the shelter which the battery afforded them. He was not only always cool, but most particularly courteous, and there was this well-known peculiarity about his grace of manner, that the hotter the fire and the greater the danger, the more suave, or, as his men used to say, "bloody polite," he became. The man who directed the engineering operations of the "right attack," in which Capt. Have on hand a very large and well assorted stock of goods in their line.

Three years ago, on Sept. 12, he was mortally offended by an officer in the army. He challenged the soldier, who accepted, with the usual privilege of selecting the means to be used of satisfying the honor of both partial ties.
